Collaborative Professional Learning to Support Vermont Schools

Identifying & Intervening with Struggling Students in a Masked or Virtual Setting

a virtual hour facilitated by Dr. Gillian Boudreau

Target Audience: K-12 Educators

COVID-19 has made it more difficult than ever for educators to feel sure that students are sufficiently supported, both because stress has increased, and because masks and remote learning can make it more difficult to ascertain students' emotional state.

This training will provide educators with:

- tools to understand the different types of stress students experience,
- how to identify and discern these based on presentation, and
- to build specific strategies to reduce student stress and build resiliency.

About our facilitator: Gillian Boudreau is a licensed clinical psychologist and a licensed school psychologist. Dr. Boudreau has worked with children and families in Vermont and New York City for many years, with the mission of understanding and addressing our human need for attachment, connection, and effective communication in such a way that can help individuals, family systems, school systems, and larger organizations reach their full potential. Dr. Boudreau works with children families and adults in private practice, with a focus on ASD, anxiety and trauma. She teaches graduate courses for educators on trauma and resiliency, and trains and consults extensively with school districts in Vermont and New York.
